Instructor: Dr. Sanchita B. Saxena

Class UGBA 192T

Semester: Fall 2021

Time/ Location: Thursdays, 8am- 10am, N270

Credits: 2 credits course

The complex world of global supply chains, linking thousands of factories across multiple cultural and political boundaries, has provided countries in the global South with investment, employment, technology and access to markets. At the same time, however, workers in many of these factories often toil for long hours for minimal pay in difficult conditions that affect their mental and physical health, and in some cases, even cost lives. The very nature of this business model across boundaries often results in a “hands off” approach to labor issues due to a lack of knowledge and information about the reality on the ground. Many private initiatives to address these issues have been tried and tested, some with limited success.

This class will help students to understand the difficulty of ensuring good labor rights in very complex settings. Specifically, the class will cover:

- Key aspects of global supply chains
- Various solutions that have been tried to address the issue of labor rights in these supply chains
- New approaches that go beyond the social audit, focusing on the role of technology, labor organizing, the role of domestic governments and the domestic private sector
- Ways of rethinking the business model that may be beneficial for improved labor rights in the future

Course Objectives

- Foster awareness and empathy around the everyday realities faced by workers in global supply chains
- Analyze established solutions with the ability to critique their efficacy
- Think creatively about new approaches and potential solutions that businesses can adapt on to improve worker rights
- Acquire teamwork, group communication, and presentation skills
